

White Homeland: Cascadia

Does the Northwest Territorial Imperative have any use to us?

In the wake of the civil rights movement of the 60's, where the old stock Anglo finally lost any semblance of power within the US government, many pro-White activists & thinkers would start scrambling for ideas to remedy this issue. Most of these ideas were further developments of what people who could understand where the world was going (the Klan, Rockwell's ANP, etc.) had already written up. But unfortunately, the situation worsened considerably since they were around. The South, in terms of the Old Dixie, was dead. The civil rights movement finished what the Yanks started during the Reconstruction Era & ended the proud traditions of old. Worse still, the South was rapidly being overrun with Blacks who took over major cities while the only truly pro-White voice in DC (the Southern Democrats) were quickly replaced by the Democratic party we know of today. That isn't to say good men weren't fighting in the South, they still are today, but the situation got bleaker by the day.

The situation up north wasn't much better. Foreigners & non-Whites overran most big cities like NYC, Chicago, Detroit, etc. while the suburban Yanks did nothing to stop it. Unlike the South, the North never had to deal with the Negro menace en masse, and didn't have old grandpa Joe to tell them how scare them off. Much like today, most of the Liberal intelligentsia was congregated in those big cities north of Richmond. In the Southeast, bleh. No one wants to live anywhere between Palm Springs, CA & Dallas, TX. I live in the Mojave now (unwillingly) & can tell you now that this is not the natural environment of the White man. Also, since the immigration laws of the 60's, the whole area is overrun with spics.

That leaves two regions: the flyover states like Oklahoma & such, and the Pacific Northwest. Both of these places are valid options for the most part, but once we get into the topic of separatism you narrow it down to the PNW. The only reason being the much better geographic location of the PNW, especially it's access to the sea & terrain more accommodating to a revolutionary movement (try fighting a large scale guerilla war in the great plains lmao).

Thus, the talks started developing about what would eventually be called the Northwest Territorial Imperative (NTI). Richard Butler, leader of the Aryan Nations, would probably be the most important figure in this movement. The first major development was at the 1986 Aryan Nations Congress, attended by other pro-White groups from across the country. In it, the plan was laid out that any racially conscious Whites should relocate to the PNW (mainly rural areas unless work necessitated being near an urban area), networking together, and having a lot of children. Essentially the plan being long term settlement, to maintain a racially conscious White majority & protect the region from outside influence so that all Whites could have a redoubt to retreat towards.

As part of this plan, setting up a parallel polis to culturally separate themselves from the System. This included homeschooling/private schooling, making their own radio & TV networks, community policing, etc.

An early supporter of the NTI, who himself moved to Washington from Arizona, was the brave Robert J Matthews, along with his allies in the Order & National Alliance. Randy Weaver & his family are also known to have moved to Idaho as part of the NTI. Matthews & the Weaver family are now some of the most widely revered martyrs of White struggle.

Harold Covington, one of the most important NS figures in American history, would form an organization called the Northwest Front in order to promote the NTI. As part of this, he would publish several books with the most notable being The Brigade (big recommend btw). The Brigade, as well as the martyrs mentioned earlier, would transform the originally peaceful concept into one of separatism & revolution.

Although not primary motivations, both Atomwaffen Division & The Base played around with the NTI idea as the PNW is still overwhelmingly White, particularly outside the big cities. A good chunk of AWD & the main nucleus of The Base was in the PNW already.

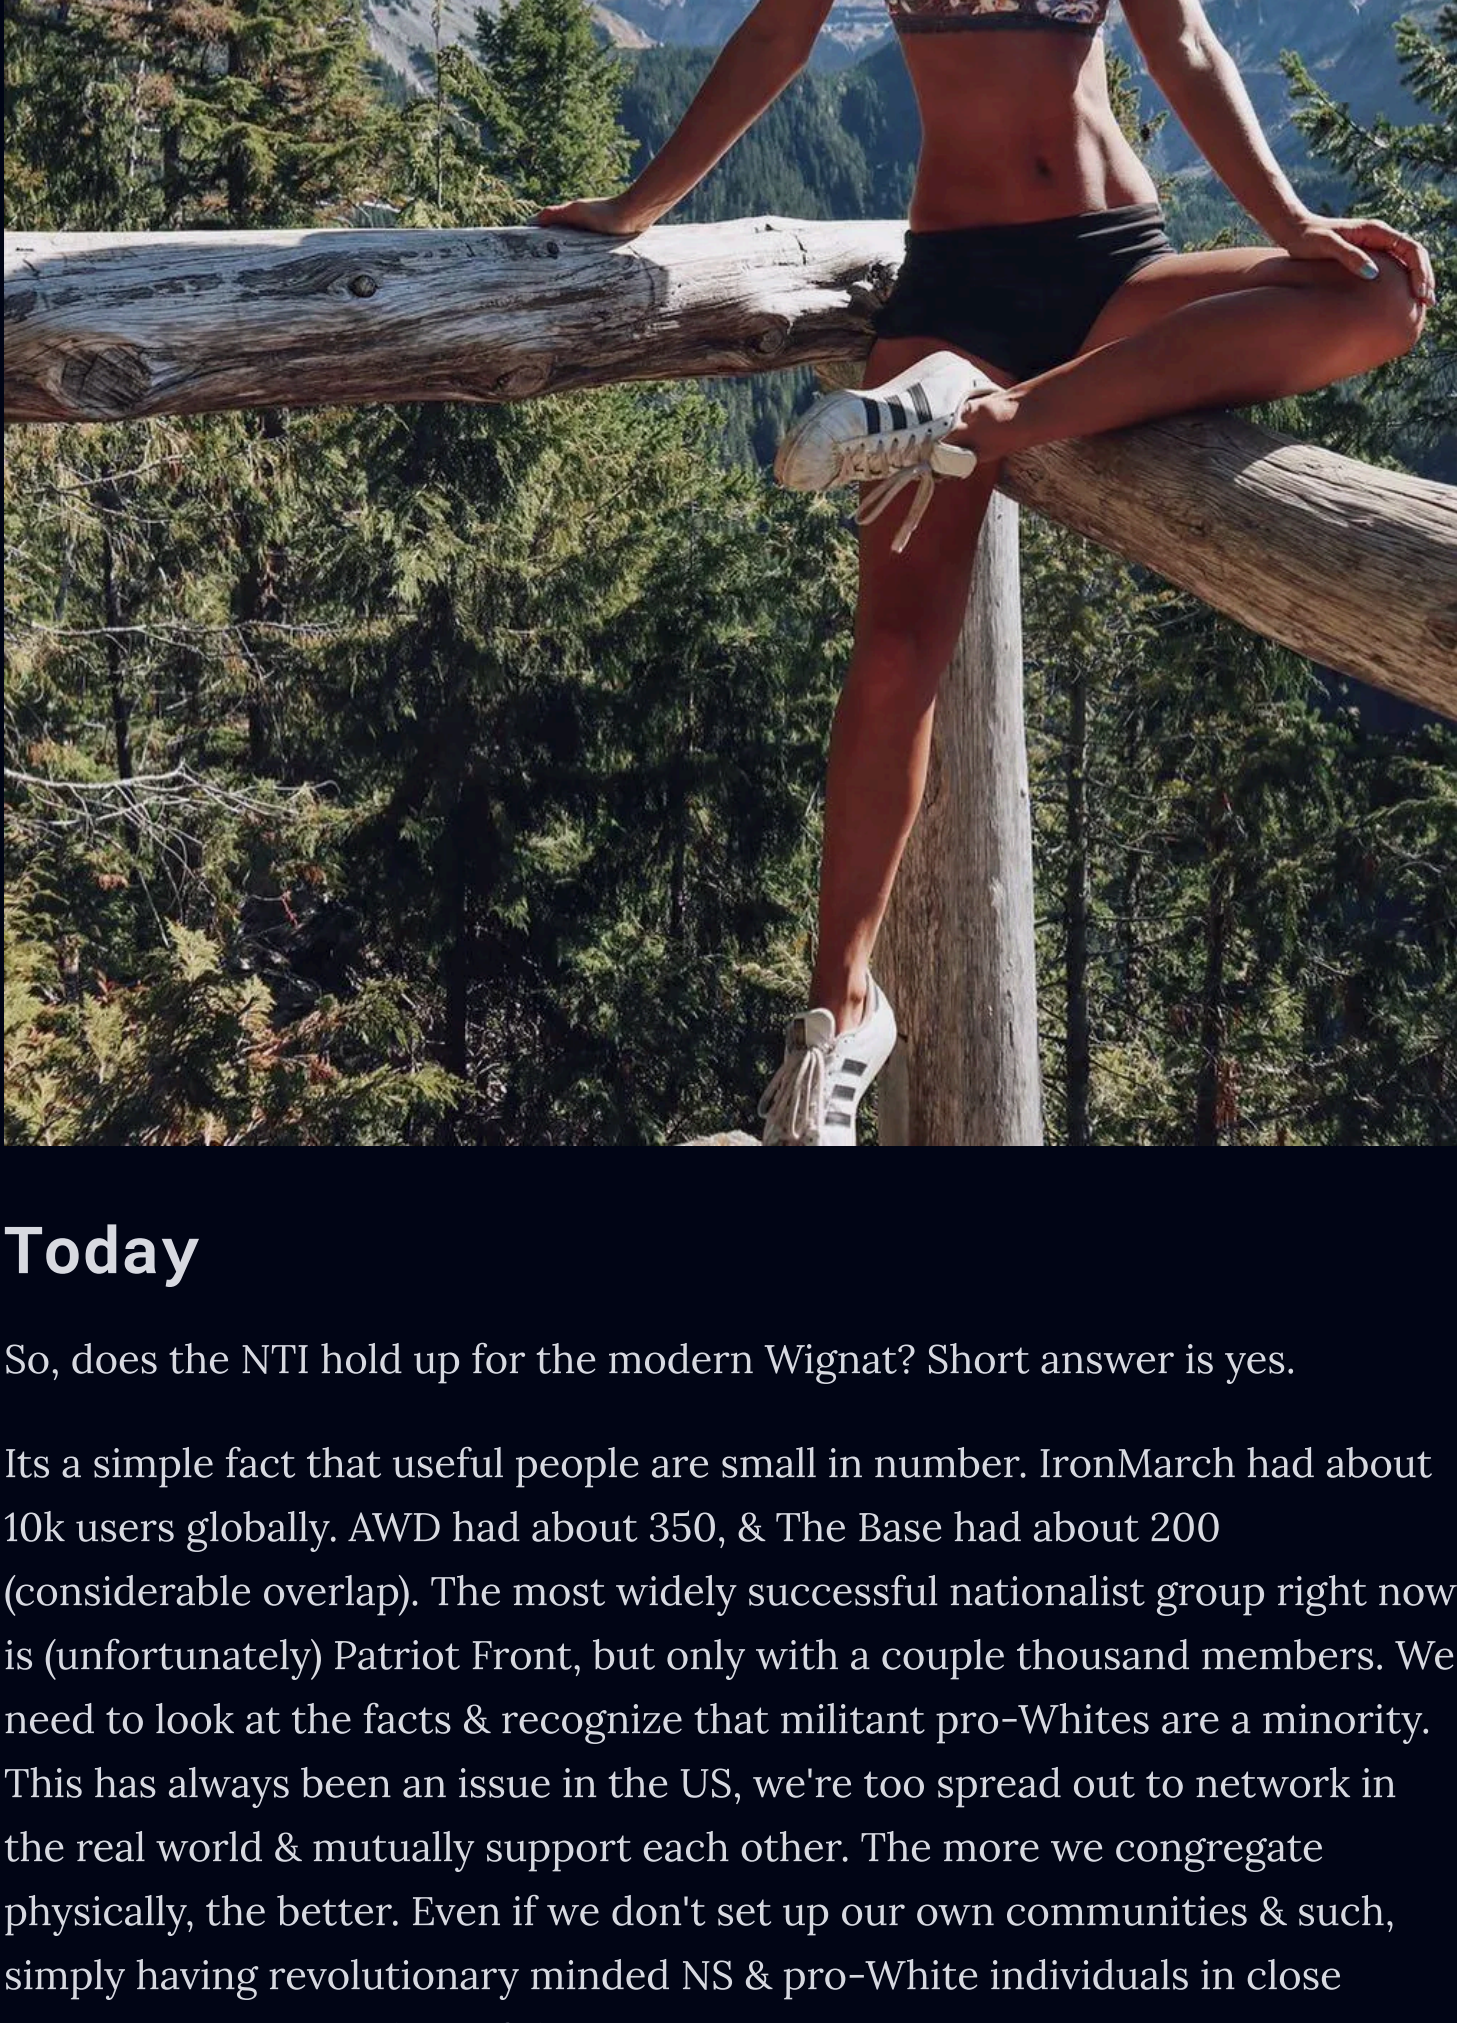

Criticisms

One of the earliest criticisms of the NTI came from the good old boys of the South. This included many klansmen. They essentially say it as a defeatist tactic, they didn't want to be abandon their homeland and move cross country. This was particularly controversial because so much of the pro-White sentiment in the South was rallied around the memory of the Confederacy & anti-Reconstruction fighters.

This is core of most modern criticisms as well, many WNs just don't want to leave home or abandon the less racially conscious Whites in other regions. It's a fully understandable sentiment, and I'll get to my response later.

The other criticism is that it won't work, that there aren't enough of us make any impact in the area. This one's stupid because that was never the plan. The only impact that needs to happen is metapolitical, and on very local areas like small communities & rural counties. We aren't competing with the entire voting population of Seattle, just the other 500 people living in Lake Whatsitcalled.

A third criticism, which I won't bother entertaining much, is that it's un-American. If anyone still clings to the rotting corpse of the US, they aren't politically literate enough to both talking to.

Today

So, does the NTI hold up for the modern Wignat? Short answer is yes.

Its a simple fact that useful people are small in number. IronMarch had about 10k users globally, AWD had about 350, & The Base had about 200 (considerable overlap). The most widely successful nationalist group right now is (unfortunately) Patriot Front, but only with a couple thousand members. We need to look at the facts & recognize that militant pro-Whites are a minority.

This has always been an issue in the US, we're too spread out to network in the real world & mutually support each other. The more we congregate physically, the better. Even if we don't set up our own communities & such, simply having revolutionary minded NS & pro-White individuals in close proximity is extremely useful.

In refutation of the criticism that we're abandoning other Whites, it's not true. Congregating in the PNW will allow us to set up a sort of safe haven to support the overall pro-White & NS movement. Making propaganda, gaining funds, distributing funds, etc. It will also act as a fallback for people that are attacked for being pro-White. This means that someone who gets doxxed, fired & threatened for wrongthink will have somewhere to escape to & can get a job to not only support his family but support the whole volk.

Lastly, in a military sense, it only makes sense to form an enclave in the event of System Collapse. The best example is in The Turner Diaries when the Organization takes over a chunk of SoCal in chapters 19 through 23. They eventually use this area as a safe zone for Whites, and as an open training ground where the System has no ability to keep them underground. The PNW is particularly useful in this sense because of it's relatively low population & rough terrain. We can establish a foothold in the rural regions & eventually lay siege to places like Portland & Seattle. The rough terrain guards the region from the east with the mountains of western Montana & the approach from the south isn't much nicer. It's actually not to dissimilar to northern Afghanistan. Using methods already pioneered by the Provisional IRA we can establish a good base of support, or at least compliance, in the mean time (see image below).

As I've said before, all of this scales proportionately to the extent of System Collapse.

All of this isn't to say that we are removing ourselves from the pro-White struggle across the US. A primary objective will be to support the overall volk. I'd say that a similar strategy should also be applied in places like New England, essentially the same as what I've already said just change the location a bit to better support the east coast Whites. Same thing for the Michigan area, the Upper Peninsula is already basically an ethnostate anyway. To lesser extent, this can be done in the still White areas of the South, Texas, etc. so long as they have a safe haven to support it.

Something I should bring up is the more modern idea known as the National Redoubt. The Redoubt was formulated around 2010 by James Rawles, who is the typical evangelical libertarian type. He formulated it as a place for "Conservative Christians" to congregate in to escape modern Liberalism & survive in a collapse scenario, he's a big survivalist by the way. Although he has the typical boomer view of racism, it's pretty obvious that all of the people he's talking about are White. The Redoubt is slightly different from the NTI geographically, as it includes the whole of Montana & Wyoming while excluding the coastal regions of Washington & Oregon. This idea shows the continuing development of the NTI concept, as anyone who's politically literate will already know that the "Conservative Christians" of 2010 will be the pro-White bloc of 2030. These more milquetoast Whites are necessary to form a supporting populace for the extremists to operate in.

Conclusion

As I've said, I fully support the NTI. As a Southerner, I originally was against it until reading the Turner Diaries & witnessing the absolute state of the South. The best way to enact this is the modern day is to network with likeminded individuals & live in close proximity to each other. For work & activism reasons, I would actually recommend against a cabin in the mountains of Idaho & instead say live in the rural regions just outside big cities. A good example would be the Rogue River region in SW Oregon or the Olympic Peninsula in NW Washington. The Cascade mountain range that cuts through the center of both states is also great. Canadians, figure it out, I don't know what it's like up north.

Hail Cascadia, Hail Victory.

I'm from the south too and always had similar gripes about the PNW movement. Interesting to think about it like this. The part of TN I live in is fine but a lot of other parts of the south are fubar.

There is a Ghost Town in Woodenville WA for sale right now at about $2m. That's feasible to buy outright with a small amount of people, or a single person taking a mortgage.
